Top 5 most hated words

Tens of thousands of people have voted on the grossest word in the English language — with “pus” taking the top spot. The icky word — defined as “a thick yellowish or greenish liquid produced in infected tissue” — received a whopping 9,799 votes in the poll, which was conducted by the online language platform Preply. Unsurprisingly, a number of other words describing bodily fluids also made the top 10, including “phlegm,” which came in second place with 8,984 votes, and “mucus” at seventh with 7,083 votes. A number of other foul words in the top 10 described the leaking of fluids, including “seepage,” “ooze” and “splooge.” “Splooge,” while perhaps better known as a synonym for “ejaculate” in American vernacular, is defined as “an abrupt discharge of fluid.” Online language platform Preply has conducted a survey of the grossest words in the English language, with “pus” landing in the top spot. Getty The complete list of top 10 words are: Pus (9,799 votes)Phlegm (8,984 votes)Seepage (8,799 votes)Moist (8,234 votes)Splooge (7,893 votes)Fester (7,223 votes)Mucus (7,083 votes)Ooze (6,990 votes)Putrid (6,912 votes)Curd (6,344 votes) “Many people feel queasy towards certain words or phrases,” Preply spokesperson Daniele Saccard said of the poll results, as reported by the Independent. “This phenomenon is called word aversion, meaning a strong dislike or repulsion towards the word.” The wordsmith added: “This demonstrates just how powerful language can be. Language has the ability to make us feel all types of positive emotions, including love and happiness. However, on the contrary, language also has the power to make us uncomfortable or [feel] disgust.” Tens of thousands of people voted in the survey. Many of the top words described bodily fluids. Getty Images Others who didn’t get a chance to vote chimed in with their own disgusting words on Twitter, after the poll was published. “Smegma!” one person declared, referring to the word to describe a build-up of shed skin cells, skin oils and moisture beneath an uncircumcised man’s foreskin. Another posited that the words “snot” and “slimey” should also have made the top 10, while a third person declared “vomit” to be the grossest word in the English language. We hope we haven’t left you feeling too nauseous. Special thanks goes to oxforddictionaries.com for help with definitions. It turns out that there are certain words that make the average person cringe more than others. So before you fire off that next email to your boss, be sure you avoid these unfavorable words. Our results come from several polls and surveys conducted by sources such as Oxford Dictionaries and their initial #OneWordMap survey. The survey obtained a clear leader before it was shut down due to misuse. Readers Digest also provided interesting results from readers about their least favorite words. So here are the nine most hated words in the English language.1. MoistMoist is by far the clear winner when it comes to least favorite words. Plus, moist has been around since at least 1325 A.D., which means people have had plenty of time to get sick of its use.2. FlapIt can be used to refer to a bird in flight, or extra skin, or, you get the idea. Flap is a word that generally is voted relatively high as being a less than desirable word choice.3. WhateverAccording to Marist Poll Results, the word “whatever” consistently scores as the most annoying word in the English language. People of all ages and backgrounds use the word. It is a common way for people to express their frustration with something they don’t understand or can’t explain. Wikipedia defines “whatever” as “a slang term meaning ‘whatever you say, ‘I don’t care what you say or ‘what will be will be.’ The term is used either to dismiss a previous statement and express indifference or in affirmation of a previous statement as ‘whatever will be will be.’” 4. DudeThe word “dude” seems to be loved or hated by people. Those who love to use the term have seemingly made it applicable to any and all situations. For example, “dude” can be used to refer to a male or a female. It can also be used to get someone’s attention. The extensive range of uses has annoyed others, making it one of the nine most hated words in the English language.5. LikeThe girls from the movie Clueless were exceptionally skilled in their use of the word like, and many teenage girls soon followed suit. Unfortunately, it has made its way into some people’s daily usage as a filler word with no real purpose. 6. LiterallyI literally had no idea the word literally would end up on this list. This is another word that some people love or hate. Again, some people use the word literally, like literally way too much.7. FlaccidOxford Languages defines flaccid as “soft and hanging loosely or limply, especially so as to look or feel unpleasant.” For example, “she took his flaccid hand in hers.” Read that example aloud, and you will see why the word is so hated.8. PantiesThe word panties in itself is innocuous, but for some reason, it gives some people an uncomfortable feeling. An innocent name for female underwear, panties just rub some people the wrong way.9. PusPus is a word used to define a thick yellow fluid type matter produced by the body as an inflammatory response to an infection. While the fluid is the byproduct of our bodies’ response to an infection, it’s no wonder why the word has made our list. Even hearing the word can cause some people to squirm in their seats. There you have it, the nine most hated words in the English language. In summary, there are two types of people: those who hate these words and those who don’t care either way. So next time you are having a conversation with your boss or are about to send that email, double-check the words used are not part of this list. You never know who may have an adverse reaction to your usage of one of them.
